: He testified that he was a "one step away" from being removed from the United States; that he believed his family would face persecution if he were removed to Mexico; and that he could not obtain work without a government document. -3- immigration judge's factual determination is reviewed for substantial evidence. Id. This court does not reverse a finding of fact unless the evidence not only supports a contrary conclusion, but compels it. Id. Rodriguez first contends that the IJ's findings were not supported by substantial evidence. He argues that the only evidence presented by the Department of Justice – his fingerprint card, his asylum application, and the letter from his brother – are not enough to establish that he is married. He asserts that the IJ's findings, based on this and on his own estimate of the times he visited his brother, were not supported by substantial evidence because his attorney said he had been married at that time. He also contends that the wife is his cousin, and he has not introduced any evidence to show that he is married to his cousin. We disagree with Rodriguez's characterization of the IJ's factual findings. The IJ considered and questioned both his testimony and his fingerprints, and found his story unconvincing. The IJ also considered the documents he gave in support of his claim, which proved that he had visited his brother in June 1997 and later. As to the IJ's factual finding that Rodriguez was not married when his application was filed, we agree with the government that this finding was supported by substantial evidence. Rodriguez's story regarding his marriage is not plausible in the light of his documentary evidence, which the IJ's finding was supported by. While Rodriguez argues that the IJ was wrong in finding that he was not married, he offers no explanation for the IJ's finding. Thus, we conclude that this factual finding is supported by substantial evidence.
