If it is in c:\program files\autodesk\autocad2014\plugins\ you can step through it, if you have the source, theres no guarantee you will be able to debug it. It is true in economics. But that is not the main issue. Rather, it is the question of how political institutions like the EU actually work. After all, we are not talking here about the existence of political institutions. We are talking about their actual operations. So it is the case that there is a continuum between laws which have to be obeyed (or at least followed) and the separate existence of some forms of government. Thus, one can have political institutions which are either legal or not, but there may be those which are either public or private or both or neither. Indeed, the point may be that governments are always of a mixed-legal-and-public-character. Thus, it is the case that: * you cannot recognize some government-to-government relations which are not really government relations at all (such as the Queen of the U.K. relating to many of the English people, but only obliquely to them); and * you cannot recognize some arrangements between private-sector parties (contracts between the Labour and Conservative Parties of the U.K., the performance of a contract between a contractual party and the British government) as being governments in the way we typically think of governments (although it should be noted that governments of the U.K. have also entered into many bilateral agreements with nations). I recall that the U.K. has a "crown" in the form of an effigy of Queen Elizabeth I on the reverse side of the pound. There may be a similar issue with the EU. It is certainly often the case that EU treaties provide for ways of transferring individual nations' sovereignty (e.g., the back-doors into the EU for the U.K., but not for all EU members). However, one is often tempted to say that the constituent member states regard them as having the same legal character as a private contract between the European Union and the individual member state, since it seems they can simply dissolve them at will (have the back-doors been removed?). The concept of "government"
