I'm adding a callout to a pdf which links to a website. The website consists of a Flash movie and an HTML site. When the user clicks on the link, the Adobe-generated code tells the client to open the link in an iframe, passing along a referrer object. I'd like to remove the referrer parameter from the client's click event. I assume I'll have to use the LoadRequest to find the current load object, but where do I find the current load object? A: You can query the LoadContext's request, to get a reference to the item that is currently loading. Hope that helps. For the first time in years, President Obama signed a bill that allows families and children to get on the path to citizenship, instead of the impending crisis of poverty. Sen. Richard Durbin (D-III.) spoke at a press conference when he announced: "We have achieved a solution to the Dream Act for the first time in years."

The European Union should develop a database listing the criminal records of people applying for immigrant status, according to new research that says databases can be a vital tool in the struggle against forced marriage. But it is vital the EU makes the information readily available to police and national officials, say the authors of the study, published in the journal, European Child and Adolescent Psychiatry. Dawn Butler, Labour MP for Brent Central, said this week that European nations should adopt a database listing forced marriage suspects to see if they have been interviewed or prosecuted. "This would improve everyone's ability to work together and pull out individuals who we are identifying as being targeted by those involved in this type of crime," she said. The study describes how a massive database that lists the names and addresses of women at risk of forced marriage, owned by the Dutch national police, has made it easier to target those who fall prey to such schemes. It was found in 2017 that 78 per cent of all suspected forced marriage victims were women from outside the EU. In the Netherlands, last year a politician's MP record came to light after she was recorded telling a victim of her forced marriage that she "should be grateful she'd been taken". The study's authors said: "There is a substantial body of literature on the value of databases in the context of child victims of violence, and more generally in the context of missing person cases. "However, forced marriage is a largely hidden crime, and police and legal systems have not prioritised the development of databases specifically for the detection and investigation of forced marriage cases. As such, we had to develop a new model for the creation of a database tailored specifically to the unique nature of this crime and its suspected victims. "Our data shows that a database with specific identifying features
