(BriefHistoryofevolution) Why do we have glands? (BriefHistoryofevolution) A quick history of evolution to help you remember what happened and why it matters... The history of human evolution has been written in stone for the past two million years. The idea that we're the only 'true' human beings is a beautiful lie. From head to toe, we humans are animals with a 'glandular' body, governed by a few fundamental rules. We are only human thanks to those glands. Why do we have glands? Humans started out like every other animal. Our ancestors, the apes, were hunters, foragers and scavengers, living in small groups in tropical forests. The adaptation of surviving in a jungle meant that in order to thrive, they needed to extract moisture from their food. The muscles of our body are mainly water-conducting tissue. A constant supply of water is vital for survival. We needed to develop a way to assimilate water from our food. That's where the glands came in. The three major glands in our body are the liver, lungs and kidneys. The liver breaks down raw food, storing vitamins and minerals. Our lungs are like a filter, sucking oxygen from the air and pumping it through our body. Our kidneys (filters) then scrub our blood clean of the waste. The rest of our body does the rest of the work, keeping us alive. Today, millions of people live long, healthy lives, without ever knowing the incredible miracle that happens when our glands function properly. Also, glands are glands. Dogs, cats, sheep and other animals have many more glands than humans, yet live longer, healthier lives. You only need to look at the family dog to see how essential they are. A dog rarely goes a day without eating and urinating. A dog produces water, food and waste d0c515b9f4

But few now remember the agreement itself, or how it was the product of on-the-ground work and careful negotiations by two individual women: Barbara Burry and Bronislawa Dabrowska. In the early 1980s, the Cold War had deepened and passions were running high on both sides of the Iron Curtain. Relations between Poland and the Soviet Union had become poisoned in the postwar years by the secret arrests and disappearances of hundreds of thousands of Polish citizens
