Edition).After a pair of separate incidents in the past four days in which passengers were told to leave over flights in the middle of the night, Delta says it's trying to come up with a better sleep-time policy. "It's not what we want to do," said Delta spokesman Michael Thomas, "but we are trying to find something that works." Delta already allows passengers to book pre-emptive cancellations during the middle of the night. Thomas said that if Delta has to get up and kick out a passenger, Delta wants to do it before the plane is still taxiing on the runway, not after. "We have heard back from customers that want that policy," he said. Thomas said Delta is taking a number of steps to make customers more comfortable. First, Delta is converting all flights to pre-flight boarding passes. All passengers will get their boarding passes in the morning, before the flight and before the flight is scheduled to take off. That way, passengers won't have to scramble for them at security checkpoints in the middle of the night. Also, Delta is making the last rows of the plane larger. "It gives us a little bit more room, so people don't have to fight to get into the middle of
