Zuck is set to kick off Facebook's 2017 user conference, F8. The rumors are already swirling that Facebook is going to show off its virtual-reality headset. But there's a lot more to come. Zuck is expected to announce the next phase of apps, including unannounced products like the Oculus Rift and a new app that takes on the Google approach to searching with voice commands. There will likely be a rebranding of the service, and, as of late, increased investment in augmented reality. But Facebook has long been at the forefront of many of the phone trends that have transformed the smartphone landscape. The company has used apps to make the mobile phone a better camera. Remember, the iPhone required the app Instagram to transform photos into digital works of art, and then the company could catch the public's attention by measuring who was sharing how many photos, and who was posting the most. When Facebook bought Instagram for $1 billion, many at the company saw it as a way to prove it could do more than one thing at a time. And that has even trickled down into the core app. The company started its app shopping spree soon after the initial success of the app store, as part of a combination of acquired companies and deals that put it on roughly the same level financially as Google, but didn't have the same brand awareness. Acquisitions played a crucial role in helping Facebook reach its current size, says Chamath Palihapitiya, a founder of venture capital firm Social+Capital. Facebook probably doesn't have a Google-like presence in 10 other countries, but they have a massive presence in another 60-70 countries where they have thousands of employees.
