From now on, I'll download the latest photos on the desktop before making a diary entry on the new phone. And the new, photos of the phone will be synced from the phone to the desktop. I think this is a better strategy. That way I have back ups. I will work on the new phone and recheck the diaries on the desktop. Instead of checking on the phone, I can access everything on the desktop photos. I like to play with the "Image" button and see if I can find ways to improve my workflows. In the software and the culture of the industry you just can't handle this normal as a user. You as a user are supposed to wait for others to improve your tools and then you can slowly improve yourself. What Adobe is planning is creating as I see it out of the box creative tables that make it non usable so it requires customisation. Fujifilm have long bemoaned the "lock-in" of technologies and has been presenting the roadmap of new processing engines such as the X-T1 and X-Pro cameras that process RAW to JPEG on the fly without a reduction in image quality. The result is faster processing. I'm not going to get into a geek war about RAW vs JPEG here. JPEG is the way it is because it is providing a useful trade off of file size with a perceived quality advantage. What I have seen is a fall in the DXO mark scores in general with the increasing number of RAW files out there and the use of software such as Lightroom. ICC nonsense. The RAW conversion engine on the Fujifilm X-tra cameras is not ICC. It is so much better to not be locked in and have the choice to move to a new format that actually works for you.

In the picture on the left, the overall color is a bit washed out. The image seems very flat. In the example on the right, the blues and purples are much more pronounced. The image has much more of a depth to it.

There's no need to get into the nitty-gritty of precise color correction. However, if you want to get more fancy, you can use the Curves command, which is available on most operating systems, to finely adjust the colors of an image. The idea of running software as complex as Photoshop directly in the browser would have been hard to imagine just a few years ago. However, by using various new web technologies, Adobe has now brought a public beta of Photoshop to the web. If you download Photoshop Camera, you don't need to install it on your phone. Lightroom features the same Photoshop mobile app in an image browser. Adobe is also testing additional apps such as Final Cut Pro. Not only that, but this web-based version of Photoshop is updated continuously, so contrary to other apps that you have to wait for a new version to be released. If you develop a new app, you can test it using the Chrome Canary channel; if it works, include it into the main Chrome release; if not, quickly roll back to the main release. Most mobile apps available today run slow because their weight is too big and they are created using native technologies. With the rise of the web, web-based apps became an ideal solution to easily build, distribute, update and test a mobile or web app. Adobe was the first to build a web app, the other examples being Slack, Hubspot, GitHub, etc. 933d7f57e6
