The worst flooding in Queensland since 2010 was triggered by heavy rains. At least 18 people are also believed to have died in separate floods in New South Wales and Victoria. Rescuers are struggling to access remote communities cut off by flood waters and mudslides. Several other areas around the state have been inundated. "It's just wall to wall mud, and I can't say how bad it is because it is still coming down as we speak," meteorologist Adam Hamat of the Bureau of Meteorology told AFP news agency. More than 13,000 people have been evacuated, and the Australian military has flown in helicopters to rescue thousands of people in flood-hit areas, including in the state's far north. So far, there have been no deaths reported in the floods, but the authorities are preparing for a high toll. "We have seen historically in the last year alone, there have been 14 deaths associated with flash floods," Queensland Police Assistant Commissioner Brett Smith told the Australian Broadcasting Corp. He said the number of people hurt by floods could be in the "dozens" if not "hundreds". "People get
