The search tool has been updated on the Mac with features found in other Elements, if not some even more specific to Elements. Open a Pan photo in the tool and watch it open a new window–generally three panoramas will open, one on top of the other. But, more importantly, if you can see the full pan, it makes much more sense to drag and drop a selected region to view it as one file. The new content-aware feature takes into account the color, pattern, and contents of any camera's image. Moreover, you can search for keywords in all content, including any metadata, a smart search that can also be performed at the command line. The features is nothing new, but a welcome one. It enhances Elements usability. Rendering choices have been bundled up to create new effects. Perhaps most interesting is the addition of a local-processing option for Lens Cleaning. This is different from Adobe's traditional Lens Cleaning functions. It allows you to choose a specific area inside the preview window to clean, similar to what some current Pentax and Sony cameras can do. This in turn can allow you to later remove the unneeded support information from another Lens Cleaning tool using a "Preview" option. Newly added tools in the "Histogram" categories include "Create a Mask" and "Create HDR." These allow you to add a special mask to a photo, from which you can later export a new image or control highlights and shadows. Then you can save that image as a new format or edit the original. The former opens a new window with a photo along with the mask. The HDR option opens a new window with one original and three modified versions. Other new categories include "Image Adjust," "Resize," "Swap Colors," and "Colors." As the name suggests, the "Image Adjust" command allows you to quickly modify exposure, contrast, saturation, and clarity. "Resize" includes three methods of cropping: Crop, Crop to Fit, and Crop to Pixel. "Swap Colors" can swap color blocks–for example, one set of blocks of red, blue, and green on a shadowed area. "Colors" lets you apply a solid color with a variety of blended options.
